“Specialized language translation:
domain specificities and the labor market demand”

November, 26th 2019 University of Tlemcen

Theme:

Specialized languages are encountered in various contexts of international communication resulting in the necessity of teaching and translating these languages which became an effective means in various disciplines in need of accurate approaches to scientific and technical texts.

Academicians and professionals in the domain of translation are highly aware of the linguistic varieties that specialized languages offer in many disciplines regarding the interdisciplinarity it enfolds since theory and research have witnessed many changes. In addition to the advance and challenges that have occurred in the context of the technological progress and numerous skills required by the labor market.

This scientific event is to shed light on the importance of the complementary relationship between the market labor and specialized languages translation.

What is the nature of the specialized language? What is the role of specialized languages teaching in translation departments and institutes?

How does it contribute in the comprehension and the translation of the specialized discourse?

What is the link between specialized language, the translation business and the labor market? And what are the resulting economic challenges?

This national study day about specialized language translation gives the opportunity to discuss all the aspects of the specialized languages and the translation it requires mainly with the labor market demand.
